☒ Read the passage below and answer the questions that follow:

About 700,000 years ago, the world's weather turned colder. Great sheets of ice moved down and covered the Northern Hemisphere. The earth entered the Ice Age. During the Ice Age, many kinds of animals died out. Yet early humans were able to survive.

To survive, these people needed fire. They needed it to warm and light their caves, to cook their food, and to make their tools. They needed it to hunt. Hunters sometimes lit fires to drive a herd of animals over a cliff to their death.

It was not easy for early humans to get fire. At first, they had to be very brave. When lightning or a volcano started a forest fire, they picked up a burning stick and carried it back to their caves. To keep the fire alive, they fed it dry sticks and leaves. They took their fire with them when they moved. They held a flaming torch or carried hot coals in an animal horn.

After many thousands of years, early human learned to make fire. By hitting hard stones together, they could strike a light. Sometimes, they rubbed wood against wood to start a fire by friction. In fact, fire is the God's wonderful gift for humans.
